‘Dad and I are getting along much better now. I can now accept and deal with what Dad went through and how it changed him. I am the daughter of a Vietnam Veteran and proud of it!’

While family life has been positive for the majority of sons and daughters of Vietnam veterans, there are some for whom family relationships have been challenging.

After returning from Vietnam a number of veterans experienced higher than normal stress in their daily lives, which was associated with their combat experience. In some cases this led to adverse family relationships, especially with children.

Some veterans continue to experience mental health problems complicated by alcohol or drug abuse, anxiety or depression. Thankfully, many more veterans who suffered stress as a result of Vietnam have successfully sought help, recovered and maintain good relationships with their children and grandchildren.

Living with a parent experiencing these types of problems can have an impact on children long after they leave home. Some sons and daughters have experienced a difficult family life leading to feelings of social and emotional isolation, sadness, anger, aggression, shame, disappointment, a low sense of safety, self-blame and feeling overly responsible for other people. These feelings and attitudes can lead to relationship and mental health difficulties.

In response to findings of the Vietnam Veterans Health Study (1998), VVCS counsellors are available to assist and support adult sons and daughters of Vietnam veterans as they find effective solutions for improved mental health and wellbeing. If needed, VVCS can also provide you with a referral for a psychiatric assessment.

VVCS can help you strengthen your relationship with your parents and manage stress, sleep, anxiety and overall health and wellbeing. VVCS can help put you in contact with other sons and daughters who may have similar experiences to you.

We can provide you with information and advice about services and supports that you and your family may access – both within the veteran community and health services.
